As Los Angeles residents continue to remain vigilant during the ongoing pandemic, disparities continue to exist in access to supports and outcomes for LA's students and families of color.

According to the County of Los Angeles, among people 16 and older, only 41% of Black residents and 48% of Latinx residents in LA County have received at least one shot compared to 63% of white residents. As we grapple with how to support students and educators in the fall, systems leaders are beginning to discuss how to confront inequities, heal and rebuild during the pandemic.

Healing and rebuilding, particularly for under-resourced communities and communities of color, will require advocates, experts, and system leaders from many sectors to collaborate in new and powerful ways.

Join us as we bring together leaders in the education, health, housing, philanthropy, and government sectors to answer the central question, "how do we heal and what will it take to equitably rebuild with and for communities?"

Opening Remarks

- Assemblywoman Wendy Carrillo (AD-51)

About the Partnership for Los Angeles Schools
Launched in 2007, the Partnership for Los Angeles Schools' mission is to transform schools to revolutionize school systems, empowering all students with a high-quality education. The Partnership is a non-profit, in-District partner to LA Unified, not a charter network. As an independent nonprofit organization, the Partnership serves 14,200 students across 19 LA Unified schools in Watts, Boyle Heights and South Los Angeles. The Partnership works within the Los Angeles Unified School District context, which includes honoring all collective bargaining agreements for its teachers and school staff.
